Teacher Strikes

Why are there teacher strikes?

Let's look at the story

Some teachers in England and Wales will be going on strike over pay and conditions, meaning some schools may close for a few days in February and March. Many teachers are members of unions. The largest education union in the UK, the National Education Union (NEU), asked its members to vote on whether to take this action and more than 90% voted to strike.

On strike days, teachers who are part of the NEU, will not work, so some schools will be closed to pupils.

Why are teachers taking strike action?

Teachers' unions argue that the 5% pay rise teachers in England and Wales received last year, is actually not an increase at all, with many teachers in fact left with less money because of inflation. Inflation is thought to be at around 10% and sees the cost of things like food and fuel increasing. The cost of living crisis is having a big impact on teachers too.

We want an above-inflation pay rise to help teachers tackle the cost of living crisis. When the government can't get teachers to join the profession and can't get teachers to stay in the profession, in the end that becomes unsustainable and that's where we are now.

Dr Mary Bousted, the NEU general secretary.

- > Read through the news story and discuss reasons why some teachers are choosing to take action. Talk about how it could be a very difficult decision for many teachers.
- > Read the information found on Resource 1 and watch the useful video, which provides questions from children about the strikes with answers from their teachers.
- > Head teachers are expected to try to keep schools open, where possible, during the strikes, following advice in the Department for Education (DfE) guidance. It's likely that many schools will close temporarily as a result of the strike action. Teachers' unions are required to give two weeks notice of a strike in order to give schools and parents time to prepare. It's thought that for many schools, children will be continuing learning online. Can you remember when you last had online learning?
